

Take a look at what you'll see when you visit the African American Cultural Celebration
at the North Carolina Museum of History (NCMOH)!

If we travel to the NCMOH by car, we will need to find parking.
Parking lots and street parking are available, both with ADA accessible spots.

Depending on where we park, it might take us a couple of minutes to walk up to the building. We may have to cross a street but crosswalks and sidewalks are available.

The museum has three entrances.

The entrance on Edenton Street (pictured above) has only stairs, but two other entrances are accessible. One accessible entrance faces Jones Street (a good drop-off point) and requires us to cross Fletcher Garden and enter an unmanned door (we can push a button to open them though) where we can take elevators to the lobby level. The other accessible entrance is the main entrance.

The main entrance (pictured below) faces Bicentennial Plaza, which runs between the State Capitol and the Legislative Building. To the right of these stairs, we'll find a ramp and a button to open the doors.

Once we get inside, we'll see two information desks.
We can ask questions there and . . .

arrange to borrow a wheelchair.

At the festival, we will see many artists and performers.

Inside and outside spaces will probably be very crowded.

It might get loud at the museum during the festival. If we need to, we can check out a “cool-down” kit at the information desk. It will be similar to the one pictured below.

If we need to, we can also go to a space called a “quiet room” that is located inside The Story of North Carolina exhibit on the main lobby level. You may see a sign, but you can always ask for directions at the information desks.

Every floor has accessible restrooms.

We'll also find a Museum Shop near the main entrance of the museum.

A restaurant in the SECU Education Center,
Sweet Tea & Cornbread, may be open.
Ask for hours and directions at the information desk.
You can find more information about the restaurant here.

We hope you enjoy your visit to the North Carolina Museum of History!
